I wanted to incorporate some sort of landmark from Boyle Heights. After exploring the area for a full day I thought this architecture from Mariachi Plaza fit the vision I was looking for. Water can move you in any direction without trying. You have to put in effort just to stay still. If you don't put in effort the ripple will just move to new directions instantly.

When I think of energy and trust, the first thing that comes to mind is jump rope. Playing solo jump rope is a great way to get exercise but when you jump with multiple people it becomes playful and filled with energy. Group jump rope is one of the only games where there is no rivalry or competitiveness that comes along with it. There's no opponents to complete against. It becomes similar to dancing and you're relying on your partner to keep up with the beat. Everyone jumping is relying on each other to keep up with the rhythm. It's somewhat of an unspoken trust. This image is set in a fantastical environment. There's two famous landmark architecture from mariachi plaza that I elongated to give it more of a surreal imagery. I want the viewers to feel like Boyle Heights is based from a fairy tale. I wanted to portray the same feeling that i felt when i was a kid seeing the mural in my neighborhood. I'm not going to the extreme by showcasing blue faces like in Guam but rather a more realistic tone that is pushed. I wanted to really push the pinks and red to really welcome the viewers in.
